Student Spotlight

Meet Benjamin Marconi, a second year Ph.D. student in geography! Benjamin is working to apply a host of geochemical tools to study variability in large scale climate circulations throughout recent geologic history. "I'm interested in the intrinsic link between humans and their environment, and by studying the nature of past climate change, I hope to use my research as a tool for managing decisions concerning modern climate systems. If one can understand the climatic story of the past, we can use our knowledge to work for a better environmental future," explains Benjamin.
